
The aim of this exposition of Ephesians is to bridge the gap "between technical exegesis and the increasing interest of the average Christian in biblical study" (p. 7). For the most part this purpose has been accomplished, for the work is faithful to the Greek text and yet it is pitched to the serious layman. One could wish for more preciseness in places such as the author's discussion of mystery and especially concerning the filling of the Spirit. The latter doctrine is explained only by D. L. Moody's experience (p. 78) and a reference to I Corinthians 14 as a desirable example for Spirit-filling today (p. 113). There is an unnecessary slap at the Scofield Reference Bible on page 66. The author is Professor of Theology at the Southern Baptist Seminary in Louisville.
